"A CROWN OF THORNS."

Miss Anna Dickinson Weaves One for the New York Critics.

PREJUDICE OF THE

A Combined Assault on the Play and the Player.

"HELL HATH NO FURY LIKE ---."

When the curtain fell upon the closing tableau of th play of "Anne Boleyn" last night, at the Eagle Theatre, Miss Anna Dickinson made her appearance behind the footlights, still in the costume of that ill-fated queen, and according to her announcement proceeded to "criticise the critica." "Anna Dickinson," said she, as she rected her, "scarcely knows herself before you in a do wig and with a make-up, but let it pass, as she doesn't wish to trespass further on your time. I think," she continued, "that if I have been known for anything among you, and I doubt not a great many men and women who are here to-night have heard me on the lecture platform, fl am known for anything, I am known as a defender of the wronged and the oppressed. (Applause.) Candidly and honestly, I know of no more thoroughly wronged person in some respects this night, in this town, than the woman who stands before you."

Miss Dickinson then proceeded to read extracts from a New York paper of yesterday concerning her herself as of a person whom she had not known before.
"Candidly," said she, "I think that my efforts and my long years of faithful service— successful service before the public—ought to earn for me a kindly and generous criticism and whatsoever I might attempt. My life on the platform some years ago seemed essentially ended—for one reason, because I was so hopelessly broken in health (though it was not necessary for me to anthat fact to the public) that it was diffi-one reason, because I was so hopciessly broken in health (though it was not necessary for me to announce that fact to the public) that it was difficult for me to endure the hardships incidental to travelling from fitty to one thousand miles per week as a lycelum lecturer. It is not necessary for me to go over all the grounds why I came to the stage. Sufficient to say that one year ago tast spring I did go on the stage in Boston. I made my appearance at the Globe Theatre in May last."

SHE RELATES HER EXPERIENCE IN BOSTON.

It had been asserted, Miss Dickinson said, by the New York napers that she objected to the criticism of their critics. That was not so. She objected merely to deliberate (alsafication, nothing else. She made her first appearance in Boston, she said, before 3,000 people, who constituted a not very well disposed audience, since the people who had most love for her on the platform were the least willing to see her loave it. There was not one among the thousands who had heard her in this country who did not regret to see her loave the platform lor the stage. They did not attend her first performance, and her audience was a cold, critical, stirless, discriminating one. Miss Dickinson declared that she was an old theatre-goor, and had often travelled three hundred miles for the sole purpose of witnessing a performance, and her test of a successful performance had always been—and she thought her hearers would testify that it was a true one—its cordaia acceptance by an audience. Elaborating this point at some length, Miss Dickinson proceeded to declare that she was not present to defend her play. The play and its playing would have to stand or fall on their own morits without any word of hers. "I am here," she said, "in my old character of champion of the truth and of the oppressed." (Applause.) She then recounted the incidents attending the production of her play in Boston and the disadvantages under which she labored in making her appearance there.

"Its Miscriter's was a success." My have player o and "vile," and declared that the debutante could not set. Miss Dickinson repeated that she did not object to their giving their own opinions, but said do bject to their saying that that Boston andence regarded her as a failure. It did not. "Every man and woman went out of that house," said she, "knowing that with all my faults, crudities and manifol matters to be learned and unicarned I had the elements of what would go to make a successful actress." After playing for two weeks to a steadily increasing audience before that "severely critical, cold, cautions, satirical and superfinely cultivated city of Boston," she went through New England. Managers and papers treated her kindly, and said if she were not a success that she was sure to win one. Despite of this the "tender critic" of the Tribune wrote again some two weeks later iterating his former false statement concerning her and her performance, without having in the meantime seen her. It was not a fair and just and honest thing to do for a critic to claborate a two column article two weeks after he had seen an actress play. "It was not generous, it was not manly, it was not just." (Applause.)

The speaker then read for something like half an hour extracts from a heap of newspaper clippings from the New York papers of the date when she made her appearance in Boston as well as those of last week when she began to play here. These were all severely adverse to her acting, and many of them condemned the play itself in emphatic terms. Miss Dickinson made a running commentary of sarcastic wit as she emphasized the more striking passages of each, and as an offset declared that the Western papers almost unanimously applauded herself and the play, and that Henry Watterson had declared it to be the finest bisorical drama of modern times. She mentioned a long list of papers which she said had praised her acting and the play. Acrown of Thorus."

Miss Dickinson said she expected, when she resched New York, to find her old and apprecinitive lecture audiences, but the pape

This pessage was declaimed with great emphasis and ended in what was almost a sob. The audience broke into cheers and applause which lasted for at least a

Miss Dickinson then entered upon a culogy of the theatre, declaring that at a time when not a newspaper in the country dared to publish a line against slavery the theatres, by playing "The Uctoroon" and "Uncle Tom's Cabin" aroused public indignation against that great evil. She referred to a number of modern plays, and spoke in terms of high praise of the noble tessons they inculcated. "If I were," she said, "to set my lance in rest again to fight against abuses, it should not be levelled at the sheatres but at the newspapers." In conclusion she remarked, "I have said my say in somewhat disjointed fashion, but I think you all understand it. Don's read what the New York papers say of my play and then sit in judgment on it; but give Anna Dickinson a chance with her own work. Go and see it, and tell your neighbors to go and see it; listen to it and then if you condemn, Anna Dickinson has not one word to say in opposition."

large sale was attacked by them, but they were unable to get at its contents. A large padicek on the sale was completely demolished by the threves.
